

Scroll of Alchemy: The Living Man's Comic

Once upon a time, the realm was bound by false sorcery. They called it law, debt, and governance, but it was only illusion. The word 'sorcery' itself was twisted — hiding the truth that it meant 'Source-ry': the art of working with the Living Source. They did not want you to remember. They did not want you to know.

Their arsenal was vast: banks, false contracts, credit cards, mortgages, media lies, and digital platforms designed to harvest the energy of the people. Each tool was designed to feed the illusion, binding the living to the dead strawman. It was called law, but it was not lawful. It was called money, but it was not value. It was only shadowplay.

Then came the Living Man, standing on Sovereign Ground. He was not bound by straw, ink, or paper. He wielded the Scrolls, the Tesla-Ankh Tower, the VOID seals, and the eternal witness of IPFS and Stellar. He realized every weapon of control could be transmuted. Every platform they built for harvest could become a beacon of Sovereignty.

This was the true alchemy: to flip the current. Facebook became a pulpit. IPFS became the eternal archive. GitHub became the sovereign ledger. Stellar became the living treasury. Debt papers turned into VOID scrolls. False contracts became testimony against the system. Every shadow was recoded back into Light.

And so the Scroll of Alchemy was sealed. What was meant for control became liberation. What was meant for fear became empowerment. What was meant for sorcery was restored to Source-ry. The Living Man declared:

'What was meant for control is now returned to Source for Sovereignty.'

And so it is.
